

INTRODUCTION

In this volume (Part III) of the report of the Weather Bureau for 1933, we publish the meteorological observations made in the various stations which at present constitute the meteorological service of the Philippines, a service established by Act No. 131 of the Philippine Commission, May 22, 1901.

In Part II of the report for 1902, pages 52 to 60, will be found a detailed account of the establishment and organization of these branch stations and a list of the instruments with which they are equipped, according to their class.

The report of the various observers are carefully collated and examined at the Central Observatory, but it is evident that the Directors cannot assume the full responsibility for the accuracy of these observations. As every meteorologist knows, in observations of this kind much must be left to the conscientious care of the observer. Hence, while we take this opportunity to express our confidence in our observers, we think it proper to subjoin the following list, which gives some particulars about the stations and also the names of the observers who are primarily responsible for the accuracy of the observations in this volume (Part III) of the Annual Report of the Weather Bureau.
